1. As you are aware, [redacted] is scheduled to depart [redacted] sometime in June next year. During the past three years he has done a rather remarkable job in straw-bossing our multi-million dollar construction program at [redacted] has many assets which make him unique, not the least of which are his abilities to exhort, cajole, and "out-negotiate" the construction personnel, both labor and management. In addition to authoritative eloquence, he has become fairly well versed in the modes and tradecraft of construction itself which has its obvious advantages in his particular position. As a parenthetical comment I submit that [redacted]'s past performance, when coupled to his tour extensions at personal sacrifice in our behalf certainly merit some kind of recognition in the form of an honor award from the Agency.

2. The problem at hand, however, and the purpose of this memo, is not to cope with how we reward [redacted] but how we replace him. The plan of sending [redacted] but there is not mustering popular support for compassionate reasons, in view of his imminent marriage. In all justice to [redacted] he has had some pretty isolated assignments for the past eight years and no one could righteously blame him if he demurred on this one.

3. If you should be so disposed not to insist on [redacted] assignment to [redacted] then the $64 question is who can replace [redacted]. As an understatement suffice it to say that the administrative ranks are not abounding with potential candidates. Although the bulk of the construction program will either be completed or well on the way, sufficient straw-bossing of the M&O and remaining construction will be required which
